Women with disability are diverse and equally possessing of strengths, capacities, unique preferences and desire for self-determination as all people. However, they are significantly more likely to experience poverty, gender-based violence, criminalization and systematic denial of essential human rights, including those around health and healthcare. Healthcare systems lack policy, accessible physical and procedural infrastructure and services that are inclusive of women with disability. Healthcare professionals and support personnel have inconsistent knowledge and awareness of the experiences and needs of women with disability.

A recognized leader in both the feminist and disability movements, Bonnie Brayton is a formidable advocate for women with disabilities here in Canada and internationally.

Join us and learn what we can do collectively to begin to contribute to gender and disability responsive health systems. We welcome all people with an interest in women and disability including health professionals, researchers and all McGill University students, faculty and staff.

This event is sponsored by: The McGill Nursing Collaborative for Education and Innovation in Patient- and Family-Centered Care and co-hosted with the McGill Women’s Health Advocacy Club, DAWN-RAIF Canada and the Institute for Health and Social Policy
