Most McGill people will be aware of the distinguished contribution that Bill Tetley has made to the university, to the field of maritime law and to public life and politics in Quebec. Those who are not may visit his website for an overview of his many achievements over a long career. From naval service in the 1940s, to practicing law and engaging in municipal politics in the 1950s and 1960s, to service as a cabinet minister in the Bourassa government in the tempestuous 1970s, he entered academia in 1976. But what does he do in retirement? Strictly speaking, he is not retired but still holds the rank of Professor in the Faculty of Law. So let's call it semi-retirement. He occupies a small office in the Law Library where he is very actively engaged in a number of projects. He maintains a large website on maritime law, international law, and Canadian and international political issues. He is writing the third volume of his book, Marine Cargo Claims (4th edition), the first two volumes of which recently shared the Canadian Bar Association's legal writing prize with another author. Still active on the international scene, he is spearheading the opposition to the Rotterdam Rules, an International Carriage of Goods by Sea Convention, and supporting the US Presidential Executive Order banning the payment of ransoms to pirates and kidnappers operating out of Somalia and, potentially, other areas. On the lighter side, he is compiling a book of memoirs, “funny stories” and reminiscences of the past 65 years. With his wife of 55 years, he enjoys collecting 19th century Canadian watercolours, antique furniture, books and china.
